

Understated elegance and design

Between the typical Majorcan hotels and country houses a completely different new luxury hotel has opened its gates on a cliff over the Soller bay in the northeast of the Spanish Mediterranean island Majorca: The Jumeirah Port Soller Hotel & Spa. Peter Silling and his team created an elegant concept of luxury with closeness to the environment and local culture...

The interior design intention of Peter Silling was to create a luxury hotel with aesthetically pleasing atmosphere of understated elegance combined with exceptional comfort and technology taking into account the environment and local culture of the island – what has been very successfully achieved.

The created interior design is contemporary, mediterranean style with clear references to the Majorcan tradition, which is evident all over the hotel in the guest rooms, suites, the lobby, bar, the sunset lounge, and in the restaurants. Small details such as the typical blue, white, yellow ceramic tiles decorating the back walls of the reception area to small decorative materials as Majorcan blown glass in the pool bar are included into the design. The rooms are decorated with contemporary Balearic art works with motifs and colors reflecting the Majorcan landscape and the Mediterranean Sea.

Warm tones have been favored such as sand and eggplant colors and natural materials as olive wood, suede leather, glass, natural stones and marble have been used to give the hotel a stylish simplicity and harmony.

The spacious rooms and suites with large living spaces and bathrooms provide a luxury equipment and the furniture has been designed to provide the guest a sense of total relaxation. Highlights in the bathrooms with large windows and wonderful sea views are the enormous showers with fitting lighting that changes the colour depending on the water temperature.

An expressive circular tower of 15 meters houses the reception, designed as a courtyard. This space culminates in a large glass dome with a spectacular 250 steel lamp bulbs which reflect its light into a centrally water pool.

The goal has been reached to create a new outstanding concept of luxury design that differs from the style of the existing Majorcan hotels – with the aim of stimulating interest in nature, customs and local lifestyle.

The result of the Peter Silling design is a unique hotel with a stylish, modern interior combined with contemporary functionality, luxury design.
